Linking AusStage resources to Trove articles

Draft 9 November 2011

A resource is a text, image, object, recording or the like which relates to an event, or to a contributor, organisation or venue, or to a work, genre, content indicator or other resource. Some resources exist as individual items stored in collections (like programs, posters, photographs and so on). Other resources exist as multiple copies in libraries (books, journals, articles and so on).

Where digital resources are publicly and persistently accessible AusStage encourages users to cite a unique Uniform Resource Locator for the resource. Trove provides persistent URLs for many of the resources it delivers. Of particular interest to AusStage is the storage of URLs to articles available in Trove's Digitised Newspapers.

Citing Trove records in AusStage

Remember that in creating associations between a resource and records in other tables, a minimal approach is recommended so that resource has the least number of the most substantive associations. This minimal approach will ensure that resources appear appropriately associated to users. Use the following hierarchy of enquiry to make such judgments:

1. Does the resource relate to an event? If it does, then there may be no need to create additional associations to other tables, as the event itself will already handle those associations, unless those associations are integral to the resource (i.e. a person appears in a photograph).

2. Does the resource relate to a work?

3. Does the resource relate to a genre or a content indicator?

4. Does the resource relate to a contributor, venue or organisation?

In the example below we add new AusStage resource for the article "Australians keep Theatre Royal farce moving" (Advertiser, Adelaide, 25 May 1951, 5) which relates to the existing AusStage event, "See How They Run", Theatre Royal, Adelaide, 24 May 1951, Event 15290. This particular newspaper article has been digitized by the National Library so we are able to locate it and include the URL in the record.
